

ScuttlePad.com - A Social Network For Children

August 4, 2010

Social networking has become a phenomenon that concerns everybody, and that includes children. Of course, responsible parents are none-too-keen on that. There are enough dangers in the physical world that surrounds anybody to open up to all the dangers that a networking site holds by its mere nature. Not even an adult can tell if the person who gets in touch with him is who he claims to be. Where does that leave children - young, little ones that are still to develop a vision of the world that makes their gullibility disappear? That is a cause of concern for every responsible parent, but at the same time they are aware that their children will have to join a network sooner or later. Well, this new resource will make that process as easy and safe as any parent could want.

Named Scuttle Pad, it is a social networking site that is geared solely towards those who are aged 6-11. Signing up requires the authorization of a guardian or parent, and communication is guided - word lists are extensively used. Furthermore, each and every picture that is uploaded is manually reviewed and approved. This is a direct assurance that nothing inappropriate will ever surface on the network. It can be said, then, that this new network touches upon all the points that any self-respecting parent or guardian understandably cares about.

Scuttlepad.com in their own words

"A social network just for kids!"

Why Scuttlepad.com might be a killer

Children need to become acquainted with the world of networking as soon as possible, and a resource like this one will let parents ensure that they are doing it in a setting that is absolutely secure.

Some questions about Scuttlepad.com

How does it compare with other networks for children that are currently available?